

WATCHING STEEPEL JACK.

We Took Down the Bunting of the Gillender Building.

"Steeple Jack" Anderson, a professional climber, in the employ of a Beaver street contractor, had the attention of the Wall street district fixed upon him for a time yesterday morning, while he climbed up upon the cupola of the Gillender building at Wall and Nassau streets, and lashed a long two-inch scatting to the flagstaff, which was shattered by lightning on Friday. The cupola is 250 feet above the sidewalk, and the building is 10 stories high. A representative of the Building Department had examined the staff, and decided that there was danger in its falling. After Anderson had lashed on the scatting, he cut off all iron tackle he sawed away the upper part of the flagstaff to get it to the roof of the building. Then he took the lower part of the staff in two, and drove it, one section after the other, down into the cupola through which it penetrated.
